

Price of the casing of a level 3 electrical distribution box

AI Overview

The casing of a level 3 electrical distribution box typically costs between $40 and $150, depending on material, protection rating, and size. Price Range and Material Considerations The cost of a distribution box casing varies significantly based on material and protection grade. Plastic enclosures for residential use are generally the most affordable, ranging from $10 to $25 for small units, while steel or aluminum casings for industrial or commercial applications can cost around $40 to $150 or more. Higher protection grades, such as IP65 or IP66, which provide dust and water resistance, usually command a premium. Factors Affecting Price Material: Aluminum > Steel > Plastic in terms of cost and durability. Aluminum offers lightweight and corrosion resistance, steel provides robustness, and plastic is cost-effective for indoor use. Size and Capacity: Larger enclosures designed to house multiple circuits or higher amperage systems are more expensive. Level 3 boxes, typically used in commercial or industrial settings, require more space and sturdier construction. Protection Rating: Outdoor or weather-resistant enclosures (IP65/IP66) are more expensive than indoor-rated units due to additional sealing and material requirements. Brand and Certification: Certified enclosures from reputable manufacturers may cost more but ensure compliance with safety standards and durability. Practical Guidance For a level 3 distribution box, which is generally a medium-to-large industrial or commercial unit, expect to pay around $50 to $150 for the casing alone, excluding internal components like breakers or wiring. Prices may vary depending on local suppliers, customization options, and shipping costs. For precise budgeting, it is recommended to check suppliers like Amazon, DirectIndustry, or specialized electrical distributors.
